

At the heart of Gleaming Halls stands the Council of Stones, a grand chamber where the leaders of the dwarven clans gather to deliberate on matters of the realm. The council is composed of the eldest and wisest of their kind, their beards long and their eyes filled with the wisdom of centuries. They sit on thrones carved from the very rock of the mountain, each seat a testament to the strength and endurance of their people.

Here, decisions are made that affect not only the lives of the dwarves but also the delicate balance between their hidden kingdom and the outside world. While they prefer the solitude of their caverns, the dwarves understand the importance of maintaining ties with other races and kingdoms. Trade agreements, alliances, and sometimes even tales of conflict and heroism are discussed within these hallowed halls.